

Evening Chat

The late diner wiped his mouth on the back of his hand, looked all around over his plate to be sure there was nothing remaining, rose reluctantly to his feet, and sauntered over to the cashier's desk. The late diner had a habit of sauntering over to the cashier's desk for a chat so there was nothing wrong about the way his knees and arms over the register and started the conversation.

"Matzie, did you ever notice how funny 'tis that no matter how much a fellow's makin' he's always kickin' about how hard up he is?"

"Uh hun, and did you happen to remember, too, that I've got a couple o' thin ones comin' for that sandwich and stuff—Oh thank you."

"You thought I didn't have it, didn't you, that because I mentioned bein' hard up, that I was, now didn't you. But listen, Matzie, I got enough left to take us both to September Morn and take in a bite at Anderson's after its all over. Whadda say?"

"Well, I dunno, them high brow art shows ain't often very interestin'. Not to ladies anyhow, do you think?"

"Oh, you ain't got the right idee at all. This here September Morn is nothing but a plain out and out musical comedy, and perfectly fit for both ladies and gents. But if you'd rather, I'll get some tickets for the show at the Hipp."

"What you'd better do is to save your money for Christmas. Say what all 'ryon buyin' this year anyhow?"

"Well, now, since you ask me, I'm buyin' one of the cutest little—"

"Oh!"

"—little set of blocks for my kid brother out at Fairview. An' a swell lookin' plush—"

"Oh!"

"—plush collar button box for my dad. An' a regular lookin' set o' furs for—"

"Oh how can I ever thank you. You know I been a worryin' so about what I was going to get for you. I thought maybe you'd like one o' these sets that's got a pair of socks an' a necktie in 'em. But since I found out the beautiful present you're gittin' me, why I spose I'll have to get somethin' else."

And the poor late diner listens on to her effusive thanks and curses himself for being such a fool as to tell her the things he was getting for the folks, and above all for mentioning that set of furs he was getting for his sister.
